

An Angel and A Demon (The Fallen Chronicles Book 3)

BETWEEN THE DEMONS AND THE ENDLESS ABYSS INTO THE MOUTH OF HELL Melinda and Gabe learn that they must free Daniel from hell, except that they have no idea how to find him or how to break the chains of darkness which bind him--or, indeed, any idea of what awaits them in hell. Azgaroth and Ariel cannot help them on their task. Melinda and Gabe must keep their wits about them as they negotiate their way into the very center of hell and break the unbreakable chains of darkness that bind Daniel. But that's nothing compared to how they are going to get out again...and Melinda uncovers a startling power within her that could change the course of events for everyone. Gabe looks distraught at this news, so much so that Azgaroth adds, If it helps, the amount of torment and pain is variable, and can be assigned depending on where you fall on the scales of goodness and evil. Which, before you ask, is something you humans also seem to never understand. We're not interested in what you did or didn't do. There is no celestial scorecard keeping tabs on which sin got canceled out by which good deed. Nobody cares about deeds. You could have personally walked up to and killed everybody who died in the Holocaust, and still end up in a lesser circle than the person who steps on kittens because he likes to hear them scream. We are more interested in the impurities of your soul. The more spotted it is the farther you deviate from the path of creation and the more you celebrate destruction that determines how much agony you suffer. Gabe has a frightened look about him as he contemplates this. Melinda reaches across the seat and takes Gabe's hand. Love creates, she says, trying to break him out of this funk.
