Not illustrated. 1889 edition. Excerpt: ...of these cruel arms, Is ruth, and almost death, to call to mind. But God we know will always put them down, That lift themselves against the perfect truth, Which Ill maintain as long as life doth last; And with the Queen of England join my force To beat the papal monarch from our lands, And keep those relics from our countries coasts. Come, my lords, now this storm is overpast, Let us away with triumph to our tents. Exeunt. Enter a Soldier. Sol. Sir, to you, sir, that dares make the duke a cuckold, and use a counterfeit key to his privy-chamber door. And although you take out nothing but your own, yet you put in that which displeaseth him; and so forestall his market, and set up your standing where you should not. And whereas he is your landlord, you will take upon you to be his; and till the ground that he himself should occupy, which is his own free land: if it be not too free--theres the question. And though I come not to take possession, (as I would I might,) yet I mean to keep you out; which I will, if this gear hold Enter Mugeron. What! are ye come so soon? have at ye, sir. Shoots at Mugeron and Hills him. Enter Guise and Attendants. Guise. Hold thee, tall soldier, take thou this, and fly.--Exit Soldier. Lie there, the kings delight, and Guises scorn; Revenge it, Henry, as thou list or dare, I did it only in despite of thee. The Attendants bear off Mugerons body. Enter the King and Epernoune. King. My lord of Guise, we understand That you have gathered a power of men; What your intent is yet we cannot learn, But we presume it is not for our good. Guise. Why, Im no traitor to the crown of France; What I have done tis for the Gospels sake. Eper. Nay, for the Popes sake, and thine own benefit. What peer in France but thou, aspiring...
