

Edgar Allan Poe: The Man; The Master; The Martyr (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Edgar Allan Poe: The Man; The Master; The Martyr There are six or seven faces of Poe which are actually portraits, and perhaps a score of masks, that conceal or disfigure the original, and all these have been careering through the book world to the confusion of the trustful reader. The former are Daguerreotype photographs, and therefore as reliable as sun pictures are supposed to be, which is not saying much. The others are hand copies by painters and engravers, who usually improve, more or less, upon their model, not always to the gain of the original. Pretty pictures are one thing, and character portraits quite another. Fashion favors the picture rather than the mirroring. This latter is the aim of the present portrayer, who, needless to confess, is an entirely untrained dabbler with the pencil, with no plea to offset the artistic criticisms of the scornful. My finding of the Lavante satire while rummaging, as a stranger, among the catalogues of the Astor Library in New York (see page 18) led to renewed interest in everything concerning Poe, his character and career.
