Not illustrated. 1899 edition. Excerpt: ...the land side of Havana. Atares is another. A third, Las Animas, was designed and parth built to protect the low ground lyin between the Cerro and Jesus del Monte. The main worljl of El Principe is an irregularly shaped bastioned fort, constructed of stone, probably carbonate of lime, as are most of the worljs here, surrounded by an extensive moat, with five prominent angles, pointing respectively northwest, northeast and southwest. It has five bastions, whose salients are very acute, and could be easily destroyed by shells. The curtain connecting the two bastions facing the sea is covered by a redan, as also is the curtan connecting the two bastions facing about northwest toward Chorrera. On the Havana side, toward Atares and the bay, are two bastions meeting at a re-entrant, with no curtain proper. About the same condition is shown on the face fronting the Havana railroad entering from La Cienaga. The scarp walls of Principe are some forty feet above the bottom of the ditch, which is perhaps fifty feet wide, the counterscarp twenty feet high. In other words, about twenty feet of parapet is exposed above the surface of the hill. The parapet, through which embrasures are cut on all sides for guns, is perhaps eight to ten feet of stone. There is no earth cover. The ditches are dry, and along the counterscarp are places of arms. El Principe is 187 feet above sea level and completely dominates Havana, the bay, Morro, Cabana, the coast northward, A tares, and from east around to south the approaches of the Marianao road, Christina and a cut at that distance from the station. It gives fire upon Tulipan, the Cerro, the Hill of the Jesuits, and the valley through which passes the /Havana Railroad, sweeping completely with its guns the railroad as...
