Not illustrated. 1920 edition. Excerpt: ...at the heart I leaped up and flung myself on his neck, without giving him time to take off his fur overcoat and unfasten his scarf! How greedily I gazed at him through bright, involuntary tears of tenderness! He had grown a little older during those seven years; lines, delicate as if they had been traced by a needle, furrowed his brow here and there, his cheeks were a little more hollow, and his hair was thinner; but he had hardly more beard, and his smile was just the same as ever; and his laugh, a soft, inward, as it were breathless laugh, was the same too.... Mercy on us! what didnt we talk about that day!... The favourite poems we read to one another! I began begging him to move and come and live with me, but he would not consent. He promised, however, to come every day to see me, and he kept his word. In soul, too, Pasinkov was unchanged. He showed himself just the same idealist as I had always known him. However rudely lifes chill, the bitter chill of experience, had closed in about him, the tender flower that had bloomed so early in my friends heart had kept all its pure beauty untouched. There was no trace of sadness even, no trace even of melancholy in him; he was quiet, as he had always been, but everlastingly glad at heart. In Petersburg he lived as in a wilderness, not thinking of the future, and knowing scarcely any one. I took him to the Zlotnitskys. He used to go and see them rather often. Not being self-conscious, he was not shy, but in their house, as everywhere, he said very little; they liked him, however. Even the tedious old man, Tatiana Vassilievnas husband, was friendly to him, and both the silent girls were soon quite at home with him. Sometimes he would arrive, bringing with him in the back pocket of his coat some...
