

The Page of the Duke of Savoy (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Page of the Duke of Savoy
What a man, if placed on the highest towers of Hesdin-Fert, might have seen on the 5th of May, 1555, at about two o'clock in the afternoon. Let us at once transport, without further preface or preamble, those of our readers who do not fear to take a leap of three centuries across the past in our company, into the presence of men we would have them know, and into the midst of events we would have them witness. The time is the 5th of May, of the year 1555. Henri II. is reigning over France; Mary Tudor over England; Charles V. over Spain, Germany, Flanders, Italy, and the two Indies, - that is to say, over a sixth part of the world. The scene opens in the neighborhood of the little town of Hesdin-Fert, which Emmanuel Philibert, Prince of Piedmont, has lately rebuilt, intending it to take the place of Hesdin-la-vieux, captured by him last year, and razed to the ground. So you see we are travelling in that part of old France which was then called Artois, and which is known to-day as the department of the Pas-de-Calais.
