Not illustrated. 1832 edition. Excerpt: ...went to the early prayermeeting in the chapel, and were astonished to find not fewer than a thousand persons assembled to pay their morning vows to God. These devout exercises, as in Tahiti and Eimeo, were conducted entirely by natives, and consisted of singing, praying, and reading the scriptures. About twelve hundred men, women, and children, afterwards constituted the congregation, at the public service in the forenoon. The chapel is very compact and commodious, and as many as sixteen hundred auditors have occasionally been crowded into it. The pulpit stands on one side of the square area. Around it are placed the pews of the royal family and those of the principal and secondary chiefs, according to their rank; beyond these are the forms on which the commonalty sit, and also the Sunday scholars, of whom there were four hundred present. Among these were the children of the royal line, and of the great chiefs, prettily attired, as their only distinction in purau-mat tibutas. After the sermons, on both parts of the day, it was difficult for us to escape from the good folks, who thronged around us to express their gladness at our arrival. But what pleased us most was a notice, given out after service, that to-morrow there would be a public meeting of the islanders to aroha us among them. The word aroha strictly means to compassionate, but it is used also to signify love and delight, as well as earnest desire, towards an object. Here it implied, to give us a fervent welcome--a welcome in which the tenderness of affectionate hearts should be mingled with the joy of grateful minds, on seeing the representatives of those Christian friends, in a far country, who did not neglect to aroha them in their low estate, but sent the messengers of the...
