

The Works of Daniel Defoe, Carefully Selected from the Most Authentic (Classic Reprint)

DktoB was one of the most prolific authors in English literature, having written upwards of 250 separate works, besides contributing largely to some of the periodicals of his time. Most of these works consist of pamphlets on all subjects connected with religion, politics, and what is now known as social science. During the latter part of his life, however, he wrote a number of remarkable novels, or rather histories put in a fictitious dress, almost any one of which would have sufficed to give him a permanent place in the literature of his country. Robinson Crusoe is known and read of all boys and men. The object of the present edition of Defoe's works is to present to the general public the cream of his fictions, and such a selection from his other writings as will enable most readers to form a notion of what manner of man he was. The great mass of Defoe's pamphlets would, of course, be totally devoid of interest at the present day, unless to him who is compelled to burrow among the debris of that age for literary-writing purposes. The same may be said of Defoe's poetry; and therefore the editor has endeavoured to select from this class of his works such as are likely to be attractive to the great mass of readers, either on account of the permanent interest of their subject, the manner of treatment, or their connection with an important episode in the life of the author. With regard to his other and more important works, the aim has been to select such as best exhibit Defoe's genius, are likely to interest all readers, and required no emasculation to render them fit for perusal by all classes. It has been thought unnecessary to occupy space in the way of annotation; such a service is uncalled for in the case of any of the works in this edition, and no doubt the reader will think the space better occupied by being appropriated to what came from Defoe's own pen.
