

The Works of Daniel Defoe, Vol. 1 (Classic Reprint)

Daniel Defoe, even the earliest, shows that narrative was the kind of writing for which he was fitted by nature. Yet Defoe was more than a good story-teller. He was also a moralist, an essayist, a journalist, an enthusiastic and fairly shrewd business man, a patriot, a trusted adviser of a king, and an unscrupulous political spy. Few readers of Robinson Crusoe realise what a varied and remarkable life was that of its author; few realise how late in life it was that he hit on the kind of writing which has given him his greatest fame. Daniel Defoe was born in the parish of St. Giles, Cripplegate, probably in 1659, though the date is given also as 1660 and 1661. His father was a butcher named James Foe, a Londoner; his grandfather seems to have been a Northamptonshire yeoman. The family were dissenters, the same sort of plain, religious, conscientious people as the English colonists of the time in New England. Defoe, accordingly, was sent to a Nonconformist academy at Newington Green, to be educated for the dissenting ministry.
